

It takes TIME to clean a hospital...

The trendy new technology of silicon chips, lasers and robots hasn't yet done much to clean hospitals. It still takes old-fashioned elbow-grease, commitment and hours of graft to keep wards, corridors and operating theatres spick and span.

So when private cleaning firms come along and promise to do the job with less staff in fewer hours (or when hospital management try to make similar cutbacks) it means only one thing for the patients: a dirtier hospital. For the cleaners, it means a cut in earnings, loss of holidays, sick pay and pension, or outright redundancy.

The Tory government want private firms brought in to make a profit out of cleaning hospitals because the Tories are the party of big business, and belong to expensive private medical schemes.

We want to keep contractors out and maintain cleaning standards because we use the NHS — and we want clean hospitals!
